Writing Task 2 Sample 5

Language and Culture IELTS Essay 1

Every year several languages die out. Some people think this is not important because life will be easier if there are fewer languages.

To what extent do you agree or disagree with this opinion?

Give reasons for your answer and include any relevant examples from your knowledge or experience.

You should write at least 250 words.

Model Sample Answer 1 Band 8:

Languages symbolise the cultural heritage of any region and are a means of communication and a way to express themselves. However, various languages are becoming extinct on a daily basis. Some argue that we should not be concerned because fewer dialects will make life easier. In contrast, I partially disagree with their viewpoint. In the following paragraphs, I will elaborate on my perspective on this topic.

On the one hand, fewer languages will aid in lowering the communication barrier between individuals and promoting globalisation by allowing them to communicate with a larger audience. As a result, it will expand global accessibility, allowing people to pursue their careers anywhere in the globe based on their interests, and it will increase the research potential of the world. In addition, it will facilitate business interactions among the nations and will strengthen their social and political ties.

In contrast, the effect can be seen on the region's cultural heritage after the loss of a language. Consequently, it will then impact the tourism business. For instance, People will travel to different regions and nations to learn about their cultures however will end up using the same dialect eventually forcing society to adopt the culture of a new language. Thereby, leaving no attraction for tourists. As a result, a great deal of social and cultural heritages will be lost because of people's inability to comprehend the dialect's literary works.

Model Sample Answer 2 Band 7.5

For many ages language is a primary form of communication which also gives a way to express themselves. Many people believe that the extinction of languages is not an issue as it would be a more convenient life because of fewer languages. I completely disagree with this statement, which will impact the culture of the nation. The below essay will elucidate the significance of language to culture, followed by a conclusion.

To begin with, language symbolises culture and gives a way for people to express their views. However many people believe that language is just a mere collection of spoken words. A language has evolved through centuries to reflect its significance in a given region. For example, the Sanskrit language contains a vast vocabulary in the world and represents their heritage of storytelling. Because English is so simple to communicate with the rest of the world, it has become a universal language. Numerous books were published in the native language, such as the Gita, which is written in Sanskrit. However, few people are familiar with Sanskrit.

In addition to this, speaking English and Sanskrit will exclude more individuals worldwide. Despite English is widely spoken, it takes years to acquire it. Some nations have been attempting to embrace English as a second language for a long time, but some people still cannot grasp it. However, English has been the language of business for a long time, and it should be emphasized to assist a country to become more economically competitive.

In conclusion, I disagree with the statement despite some spoken languages may improve the quality of life. However, this should not be an expense for less relevant dialects in order to avoid the country's tradition, culture and alienation of many countries.

To sum up and offer my position, I believe a killing committed in self-defense cannot be compared to a murder. The murderer should receive a predetermined and final penalty. As a result of the power of the law, there will be fewer criminals in our society.

Model Sample Answer 3 Band 7

Numerous people believe that life would be easy if the number of languages spoken around the world were reduced, despite the fact that each year a handful of languages are extinct. I agree with that view regardless of the fact that it may have certain downsides.

To commence with, having fewer languages will boost globalisation. This is because there would be fewer communication barriers, resulting in an increase in global tourism, interracial marriages, and residential migration. For instance, An Indian who could speak English could be persuaded to visit Canada, and because he likes the climate and can converse fluently, he decides to relocate, get married, and spend the rest of his life in the new nation. If he speaks his dialect, this might be impossible.

In addition, by knowing each other languages international relations might improve. Eventually, this will reduce international tensions because the leaders of these countries will likely have a better understanding of themselves. For instance, the India-China trade war might not be as intense if they shared more factors in common. Instead of engaging in commercial hostility, the two great powers would rather combat climate change by giving their vast resources and trade benefits to this worthy cause. The Sanskrit language, for instance, will eradicate the memory of their culture as they speak more English and inexorably adopt their worldviews and perceptions of life.

In conclusion, the extinction of a language can, in the end, greatly benefit the whole society, but it is not without repercussions. They must to be taught in a way that takes into account each person's accent.

Languages play an important role in an individual's life by giving them a means of communication. Recently, people believe that it is not a priority because fewer languages would make life easy due vanishing of numerous languages from so many nations. I disagree strongly with this statement and will explain why in the following essay.

First of all, the primary means of communication is language. When our ancestors developed their own language to express their opinions, it became a major achievement in the world. In the past, people used to express their opinions by making gestures and drawing pictures. People now speak a variety of languages all over the universe. Additionally, people from many countries communicate their ideas through language. As an example, people leave their home countries to work and study abroad, just focusing on the fundamentals of the language, in order to support themselves while learning the culture.

On the other hand, if languages become fewer it hardly affects the business relationships among different countries. For example, it becomes very difficult to export and import material from nations to nations without the knowledge of language. Admittedly, it is hard to learn all languages, but it is essential to know some languages to support our development of personal life and nation achievement. Furthermore, to enjoy different entertainments like movies and make progress in tourism, languages have a predominant role.

To conclude, reducing the number of languages will not make human life easier. However, it is better to support the existence of languages to mark enormous achievements in business, education and personal life.

Learning English at school is often seen as more important than learning local languages. If these are not taught, many are at risk of dying out. In your opinion, is it important for everyone to learn English? Should we try to ensure the survival of local languages and, if so, how?

Give reasons for your answer and include any relevant examples from your own knowledge or experience.

You should write at least 250 words.

Model Sample Answer 1 Band 8

In recent times, it is evident that English is given the first priority among all other languages. People from every age group find English as a very important barrier to keep a good image in society. Though this may result in the extinction of other regional languages, I believe that the acquisition of English language skills is currently very crucial.

Whether in the classroom or in the workplace, English has established itself as every country's official language of communication. A greater emphasis is placed on learning and using English. To keep up with the rest of the developing world, students are forced to take spoken English classes, even though they continue to attend government schools where English has not taken root. Moreover, being fluent in English is now seen as a mark of sophistication and elegance. A person who struggles to express themselves in English may face ridicule and even isolation.

On the other hand, a whole generation is being left behind in the workforce because they are unable to adapt to the changing language requirements. There is a significant amount of harm coming to regional languages due to the increasing prominence of one language. The words and grammar that were once integral to their culture are now lost forever. This causes the literature or creative art is written in these languages to become more difficult to understand, which in turn causes readers to lose interest. Thus necessary steps should be taken to preserve local languages. It should be parents' duty to instill in their children a lifelong desire to learn these languages. Finally, the government could play a significant role in promoting these languages by providing financial aid to students who choose to do major in one of these languages. The fight to keep a language alive is not a small one, and everyone can and should do their part.

There are conflicting views on whether or not everyone should learn English in today's society. From my perspective, it is crucial to learn English and to preserve native tongues.

The fact that English is the international language of trade, diplomacy, and education is just one of many reasons why I think it's crucial for everyone to pick up the language. First and foremost, there is a wide range of nationalities represented among college students. The language of communication and mutual understanding is English. Communicating effectively with others is a skill that can only be learned by students who master the language. Secondly, learning English opens doors and gives you more access to information. As an example, most international universities offer instruction in English, and only those students who can demonstrate their proficiency in the language are admitted. In addition to the monetary benefits, employees who learn English can take advantage of more lucrative job opportunities abroad. However, the inability to communicate in English can limit one's access to a variety of employment and other opportunities. As a result, it's crucial to learn English.

However, we should make an effort to protect local languages. Initially, local language classes could be made mandatory for students in grades primary through middle school. This way, the local languages could be preserved from generation to generation and taught to every student from an early age. Governments could also fund the creation of media that highlights indigenous languages and cultures. One strategy to increase participation is to create a TV show that uses a friendly and entertaining format to teach local languages.

In conclusion, it is important to speak both English and the native tongues of the area, and we should make every effort to perfect our command of the former while also preserving the latter.

English has become increasingly important in all walks of life, from academics to international trade to cross-cultural dialogue. Because of this, local languages are becoming increasingly extinct. While it's crucial that all students master English, it's just as crucial that our native tongues continue to be spoken, as they are a vital link to the past that helped shape our present.

The globalization process was greatly aided by the use of the English language. Numerous nations are in desperate need of a language that can be used for communication. Without knowing this language, conducting business on a global scale would have been literally impossible. English has become a status symbol as well as a measure of a person's education. If a person is unable to communicate in English, the individual is ridiculed or even socially blacklisted. As a result, in my opinion, basic knowledge of English is now required to make a mark in the world and society.

The local language plays a special role in the community. Because of their unique languages, the people of this region are able to preserve their individuality. There would be a significant loss of cultural heritage if languages disappeared. Regionally specific forms of literature such as songs, stories, books, and articles all hold their own value. Languages spoken in a particular area also serve as a vital link to the past of that place. The Sikh community in India, for instance, has strong ties to the punjabi language. Sikh scriptures are written in punjabi. As a result, they risk losing their unique culture if this language dies out.

To conclude, even though English is essential for international trade and communication, local languages should not be ignored, and citizens and policymakers alike must take action to prevent their extinction. Getting people involved in the effort to preserve their native tongues can be facilitated through the organisation of cultural events, literary festivals, or awareness campaigns.

In this day and age, learning English is accorded a higher priority than mastering any of the native tongues spoken in the area. In my opinion, it is of the utmost significance to become fluent in the native tongues of the area.

The ability to communicate in English is now widely seen as a mark of sophistication and success in today's globalized world. Someone who struggles to express themselves in English may face isolation from their contemporaries. Because English is the only language that can be used for effective communication between people of different countries, it is now required that all individuals acquire a working knowledge of the language. In today's world, it is also important to be multilingual that is knowing more than two languages as it makes oneself confident as well it helps you to communicate.

On the other hand, it's important to know the local language because our culture and traditions are intricately intertwined with it. When people stop speaking their native tongue, it has a devastating impact that can be felt throughout society. Here are some strategies to prevent the loss of regional languages: First and foremost, many schools need to hire more language teachers so that students can learn these languages. Second, we need to hold campaigns and awareness fairs to promote the use of our local language. In which children are encouraged to speak their native tongue and where the importance of learning as many local languages as possible is emphasised so that the languages do not die out. The government should also offer scholarships to students who study these languages. Finally, local languages should be encouraged at school and at work so people will speak them and not rely on English.

To conclude, in the modern era it is crucial to master English, but people should not forget their roots and local languages should not be ignored.

Language is a structured system of communication. It represents the customs, traditions, lifestyle, and history of the place. There are numerous languages used across the globe, with some being used extensively while others are disappearing as a result. This affects society both positively and negatively.

When numerous nations speak similar languages, society benefits greatly. Obviously, it is preferable to employ one main language as a bridge language, as it strengthens intercultural communication. Speaking a standard language may be favourable for professional life in certain situations since it makes it simpler to do business with or work for multinational companies because difficulties at work can be discussed in detail and handled. Furthermore, effective communication is the cornerstone of international markets. For instance, workers who are more proficient in English are more successful in their field of work because they can interact with their coworkers more effectively than those who are not.

I believe that a nation is recognised by its culture and traditions. And the best device to learn them is the language of the nation. The best example is a collection of historical transcripts of Arab history, which depicts the country's history and customs. Translations into another language may stray from the original story. This leads to cultural invasion, making the host country lose its culture. Therefore, it is important to save these languages to preserve the identity of the nation and its residents.

With the advent of globalisation, there have been a variety of alterations. One of these is the use of language. Few languages, such as English and Chinese, are now widely spoken throughout the world, significantly reducing the use of several regional languages. I feel that the use of selected languages is beneficial not just for economic prosperity but for the world's harmony as well.

Using a globally used dialect enables inter-continental unity. When the two parties speak a common language, the flow of conversation is smooth and steady. When people are able to understand one another, they do not feel insecure and uneasy. Another advantage of using a globally accepted language is reducing unemployment. It creates better future opportunities and helps them get placed. For instance, a statistical report published by a well-known newspaper organisation reveals that the number of students who benefit from learning English as a mandatory subject is increasing.

Further, one more advantage is the increased opportunity for business expansion. It is possible because English has become an officially accepted language internationally. Nowadays, the mode of communication in the corporate world is inclusive of emails, text messages, and phone calls. Having no language barrier is beneficial because it enables a smoother discussion and deal. Moreover, it is promoting international investment in local markets and helping the economy progress. For instance, multinational companies are investing in and merging local companies in India, helping them to become more profitable.

To sum up, few languages have gained popularity. Although it has resulted in the disappearance of some languages. It is a positive development as it helps people worldwide unite as well as achieve economic prosperity.

In recent times, a few languages like English, French, and so on have gained tremendous attention, while a certain number of other languages are losing their place. Even though having a common language is good for society, it is also bad in some ways.

A language barrier brings in certain insecure feelings inside an individual; it makes them question their presence in that particular region, and so on. A common language reduces their hesitation and uneasiness. It has enabled the presentation of ideas and views globally to a wider audience that can understand them. It promotes cultural exchange and helps in multilateral exchange due to easier communication. For example, after the Vietnamese companies adopted English as their mode of communication, their profitability and trade scale internationally increased by 25% in the first year itself.

On the contrary, minor and regional languages are disappearing due to this. This is harmful to culture because language is the representation of cultural identities. For instance, India has over 200 languages; however, only the major ones, such as Hindi, Gujarati, Marathi, Tamil, and so on, are used. Even English, an international language, is given more importance in comparison to the regional languages. A place can be best known and understood after learning its language. Language is something that can give people a sense of belonging and brotherhood. If it is lost, the diversity, history, and identity of a culture die.

In conclusion, a single language is important to cooperate, trade, and exchange resources; however, it cannot be at the expense of another language.

The Earth is a global village, which we are a part of. There are various types of communication methods used by humans; the most common is speech. There are interactions among people from different parts of the world, which is possible due to some languages being spoken more and more while others are being abandoned quickly. I believe it is both positive and negative progress.

The prominence of global languages like English guarantees that societies in which there were just verbal dialects or very little written material before have a higher degree of literacy. Another such benefit of global languages is that they enable enhanced understanding between countries. It is not just beneficial for countries but for individuals as well, which helps them in their education and jobs. Further, a common language is also useful for the growth of the economy. With fewer barriers between dialects, the flow of conversation is smoother, enabling trade to flourish between nations worldwide.

On the other hand, the disappearance of local dialects will have a severe impact on traditions and values. All of the traditions and history are passed down from one generation to the next via the use of books and tales, which are best conveyed using the regional dialect. The history of the ancient tribes will be dissected by the globalisation of English. Every custom in India is linked to songs and celebrations, which heavily rely on jargon and proverbs. Yet, the main appeal for travellers is these cultural differences. People won't feel obligated to travel to a nation with an identical heritage and history.

To conclude, while having fewer languages is advantageous, it will result in too much loss. Local languages hold equal importance, as they represent our culture and heritage.

In the contemporary era, language acquisition has gained a tremendous peak among youngsters. Evidently, there are numerous perks to obtaining an education in an English-speaking country, as these countries are perceived to have more current and progressive educational practices. Therefore, many individuals believe that learning English in an English-speaking country is optimal. However, some say that English can be learned effectively and efficiently in the native country by utilising a variety of resources. I support the former view.

To commence with, learning English is easier in an English-speaking country because the majority of the population speaks English, making it simpler to adapt to the English accent and sentence structure. For example, it is extremely difficult to acquire an English accent without listening to the language. In addition, living in an English-speaking country will expand your vocabulary and grammar in a natural manner. And you may inquire about any aspect of the language about which you have difficulties. You are required to speak this language, which is a wonderful opportunity to improve your speaking ability.

However, it is not the only method of language acquisition. There are numerous books that can be utilised. English podcasts or television programmes are the finest way to learn the language. Therefore, it will enhance your listening abilities. In addition, the Internet is now pervasive and superior around the globe. Consequently, the Internet contains all types of knowledge and will assist you with your questions. There are sufficient programmes for conversing with others that will increase your speaking skills.

The English language is the universal language and is spoken in numerous countries worldwide. A rapidly increasing number of pupils who study English now consider it to be the most widespread language. It is advised that learning English in an English-speaking country is the best method to acquire it, although there are numerous ways to learn a language from your native country. Nonetheless, I disagree with the former recommendations.

To begin with, it is a good idea to study English outside of an English-speaking country because continual practice is what makes one perfect, and you can acquire this skill by living in your native country rather than by travelling to English-speaking cities. Furthermore, to be fluent in a language, it is not necessary to reside in a country where the language is widely spoken. However, if a person is determined to learn the language well, he or she could watch films, podcasts, sitcoms and read journals written in the language, also one can learn English by taking language classes in school.

In addition to this, learning in this manner allows individuals to become fluent in the language before migrating to a location where it is commonly spoken. When a person moves to an English-speaking country to study the language, they may struggle with communication barriers. However, if they had learned the language in their home countries, where they could communicate with others fluently, they would have a firm grasp on the language, allowing them to communicate fluently with locals from the start. However, studying English in these nations can help you comprehend the native accent, and you'll pick up the language quickly.

In conclusion, I agree that there are many ways one can learn English without leaving their homeland however learning English in English-speaking countries helps you to learn instantly and easily.

Everyone desires to master multiple languages in order to communicate with others more effectively. Consequently, developing fluency in English in English-speaking countries is viewed as an effective strategy, but not as a replacement. Due to the underlying factors involving finances and adaption to another society, I agree with this viewpoint to a certain extent.

Firstly, there are numerous advantages to studying English in a foreign country. Openness to English-speaking citizens could be one of the most evident benefits. To elaborate, living in an entirely new city tends to motivate academic learners to speak English daily, which is nearly impossible in their native countries. Moreover, under the pressure of high tuition, students are encouraged to acquire a strong command of English rapidly so as not to waste the money spent.

However, various disadvantages must be addressed such as culture loss being the most important. To demonstrate that students quickly quit their efforts to study abroad when an incompatibility is a major reason discouraging them. To illustrate this is due to the diverse backgrounds and intense competition in academics. Additionally, homesickness is a noteworthy factor in the decision to learn a foreign language in one's native country, as the absence of family support and interaction has a greater likelihood of destroying familial relationships. Consequently, individuals should consider this issue.

In conclusion, I agree with the opinion that one can easily learn English in a foreign language owing to the aforementioned reasons. However, if a person wants to learn English, they may easily do it in their own country by using numerous resources such as movies, classes, and seminars.

It is stated that English should be studied in English-speaking countries because it is an international language and, as a result, is widely used by students. However, there are other tools that students could use to learn English. I agree that English should be studied in an English-speaking nation because it would be simpler for students to study there.

On the one hand, there are numerous advantages to learning English in an English-speaking nation. First, the availability of a native speaker will aid the individual in learning more and comprehending the topics without difficulty. Not only would frequent exposure to natives improve the accent, but also the language itself. Second, if a person studies English in a foreign city, he or she will make greater progress in learning the language than those who study in other ways.

In contrast, I feel there are a number of other approaches to studying the language. However, there are numerous resources for learning the language. There are a variety of learning tools available online, including podcasts, blogs, and articles. These will help in the growth of abilities in modules such as speaking and writing. Moreover, watching language-related videos on YouTube and other channels would improve abilities such as listening and reading. Several languages are in danger of extinction because they are spoken by very small numbers of people. Some people say that governments should spend public money on saving these languages, while others believe that would be a waste of money. Discuss both these views and give your opinion.

Give reasons for your answer and include relevant examples from your knowledge or experience.

You should write at least 250 words.

Model Sample Answer 1 Band 8

Our civilizations rely mainly on language as it is the most efficient way of communication. Some languages will eventually go extinct since very few people actively speak them. There are several debates on whether governments should spend money to maintain them or whether doing so could waste our public funds. However, I believe it's essential to keep local languages alive.

There are increased attempts from various states, primarily the more affluent ones, to preserve these languages, which could become extinct soon. For instance, languages from many cultures on our planet are shared through campaigns, language tournaments, and language scholarships for students of diverse backgrounds. As people learn more languages, they will use them to communicate in the future and preserve the languages. As we practice more, sustaining those languages for the succeeding years becomes easier.

However, many argue that governments would have wasted resources if they had to invest heavily in retaining those languages. In addition, the significant and necessary developments that will take place in our communities will require these funds. For example, various public systems, such as health care, transportation, and education, require these resources. Moreover, some languages will perish if they are no longer useful to our society because they are no longer required. Then why would they spend that money on them?

I think these languages should not be forgotten. Language is what represents our culture, place, people, and so on. If a particular place's language is omitted, the place is replaced and barren, as there will be no one representing it. Hence, we should make efforts and spend money to preserve the languages.

In conclusion, there seem to be two reasons for spending more money to preserve languages. It may cost a lot, but preserving our cultural history is worth it.

(296 Words)

Model Sample Answer 2 Band 7.5

Some languages are in danger of extinction due to the small number of people left who can speak them. Some say that public money should be used to preserve minority languages, but others think it's a waste because health care and education are more important. It's important to keep some of our heritage alive, so a small part of the national budget could go toward that.

The people in favor of investing in the preservation of languages claim that they are essential to our culture and should be kept for future generations. For example, transferring the language into the print format and translating the literature would be incredibly beneficial and not expensive. This historical treasure would be preserved for the future and may serve as a source of information for future generations if this were accomplished. Therefore, it needs to be done correctly and precisely, and the government must contribute to the process.

On the other hand, some people disagree with the previous perspective and say that there are other sectors, like health and education, that are more essential to invest in. Therefore, it cannot be justified to spend public funds on projects that have no beneficial impacts on society. For instance, development funding must go towards providing for the poor, educating children, and researching treatments for serious diseases. Thus, the remaining aspects are secondary, and funding them would be a waste.

To sum up, it is clear that some native languages are in danger of disappearing since very few people speak them. While some strongly believe that the government should use budget funds to save them, others disagree. I think that some resources could be put toward it because it is part of our heritage.

Rare languages with a limited number of speakers are on the verge of extinction. Conflicting opinions exist on whether or not governments should preserve such languages with public funds. I tend to agree that the authorities should do them a favor.

Governments are obligated to conserve culture, including all tangible and intangible cultures. As a form of intangible culture, languages appear to be tools through which people can share and communicate their ideas, beliefs, arts, and histories. Many languages are fading away, which implies that the cultures of the people who once spoke them are disappearing. Apart from that, learning a variety of languages might help historians to have a better understanding of the evolution of the civilization composed of speakers of rare languages. So, it is logical for the government to use public money to save rare languages.

On the contrary, there is an alternative perspective that considers it a waste of money. These groups are reluctant to use public funds to save languages from extinction since governments in some countries with poverty or epidemics frequently lack the resources necessary to meet the necessities of their citizens. Instead of using the money to protect minority languages, they would much rather use it to raise the standard of living for the population. However, it is feasible to request the preservation of several languages from the United Nations or international charitable foundations. It should not simply be dropped due to poverty or diseases.

In conclusion, I believe that governments must work to prevent the extinction of local languages and that the United Nations has a role in supporting those countries that are struggling financially to finish their tasks.

Many languages are disappearing since very few people can speak them. A group of individuals believes that money from the national budget should be designated to preserve these speeches. However, some argue that saving those languages would be a waste of resources. I believe that the government should try to preserve them, but by using the funds that are for the citizens.

Native languages are essential for preserving cultural diversity. Numerous speeches that symbolize other cultures' identities and showcase their cultures to the world serve as evidence for the above claim. Traditional languages also contribute to the maintenance of cultural history. Several epic books were written in ancient languages, and the loss of these would influence the history of the country. For instance, only a few people nowadays can read or speak Sanskrit, the language in which The Bhagavad Geeta was penned.

The preservation of languages is not attainable because it cannot be achieved with a minimum wage. The cost of teaching languages is the reason. In other words, in terms of teaching the language, new teaching structures and teachers are required. Additionally, no one prefers to learn less prominent languages. Because of globalization, youngsters are interested in learning international languages like English and French.

Investing so much money in constructing new educational institutions would be a waste because individuals are more inclined towards learning languages that are in use currently. The government should instead spend that money on meeting people's necessities rather than on language. That would benefit the country as a whole because there are people who are deprived of their essential needs.

To conclude, it is evident that traditional languages have values of aesthetic originality and historical significance. However, employing the public budget to save them is unfair to the population.

The advantages of the spread of English as a global language will continue to outweigh its disadvantages. To what extent do you agree or disagree?

You should write at least 250 words.

Through globalisation and providing its people with a foundation for accessing the quality education available in the developed nations, it is now true that the international spread of the English language has a profound effect on many countries by benefiting underdeveloped countries, businesses, and tourism. It has numerous advantages but also some disadvantages. I believe that the trend's advantages are more significant than its disadvantages.

One of the greatest advantages of having a single global language is that there will be no communication barrier between nations, hence reducing the gap between them. In addition, the profitable activities of multinational corporations will boost the economy, and international trade, such as imports and exports, will increase and contribute to the expansion of the global economy. From a social perspective, the English language enables people to enter a larger cultural environment, which facilitates the development of good relationships between them. This essential skill lays the groundwork for successful commercial and social relationships. The global acceptance of English as a language for communication is a result of the extensive usage of the English language, which is closing the communication gap.

On the other hand, this trend has numerous disadvantages. Language is a component of all cultures. If everyone spoke a single language, the other local languages would gradually disappear. Adopting a universal language also contributes to the westernisation of culture. People today speak a global language instead of their native one. Consequently, they are losing their native dialects and culture, and their offspring are following suit. Therefore, this trend may have detrimental effects on the tourism business.

In conclusion, while the increased use of English in impoverished nations draws foreign enterprises and visitors, local firms and residents may be hampered. However, the benefits it offers to these countries through globalisation and to their citizens by building the groundwork for quality education outweigh its drawbacks, which is a positive development in my opinion.

With the rapid growth of cities, more and more people have chosen to converse in English. Consequently, it is known as the Universal language. The pervasive use of English as the national language continues to outweigh its disadvantages. It has provided a variety of benefits to the world, and I fully concur with this statement.

Initially, the usage of English significantly increases work efficiency. As a result of globalisation, different sorts of businesses now collaborate to conduct business. Therefore, these businesses must employ a common language to interact with their business partners, and English is the most suitable option. Moreover, this migration enhances the government's hospitality industry-generated revenue. Conversely, the promotion of overseas enterprises might hinder the expansion of local businesses. In addition, due to the expanding usage of English, many local languages are receiving less attention, affecting the cultural identity of many nations.

On the other hand, learning English may be time-consuming work and an expensive topic, but the English language plays a crucial part in the global educational system, where English linguistics remains the international language of the majority of the world's best universities. In the current atmosphere, studying in wealthy nations is one of the options for a brighter future, and the English language is required because English exams are one of the prerequisites for studying abroad. Consequently, the English language is becoming the passport for students to study and travel in other industrialised nations such as Australia, Canada, and the United States.

Overall, the English language unites the world and will continue to offer it numerous benefits. I concur that English will strengthen the communication systems of all nations. On the contrary, cultural variety may be diminished.

Model Sample Answer 3 Band 7

There is a substantial body of literature discussing the international spread of the English language in the present day. Oft-debated is whether the widespread use of English is a positive phenomenon or a threat to other languages, particularly indigenous ones, and a frequently intolerable formality. In my perspective, this event can offer a multitude of advantages.

To begin with, English has a strong international standing. One of the primary benefits of including English as a global language is that it bridges the communication gap between countries, uniting people of diverse ethnicities, cultural backgrounds, and races around the world. In addition, the widespread use of English as the international language attracts foreign businessmen and visitors from industrialised nations, hence accelerating globalisation. In addition, English is the only medium of instruction at many of the world's most prestigious colleges, and professionals with great English speaking skills have an advantage in the job market. In addition, English helps travellers to travel globally without meeting linguistic barriers. Many travellers have difficulty communicating with Indians. If there is only one language, travel concerns will be resolved.

However, one cannot dispute the disadvantages associated with global language. The adoption of a universal language contributes to the westernisation of culture. People today speak a global language rather than their native tongue. Consequently, they are losing their native dialects and culture, and their offspring are following suit.

In conclusion, despite the fact that I recognise the disadvantages of English as a global language, I am confident that English will strengthen the communication systems of all nations, thereby diminishing the significance of the disadvantages.

In the current technology era, it is asserted that English has become an international language, and its use to communicate is increasing day by day. At present, however, the English language is eliminating other languages. It has been argued that the advantages of English's globalisation outweigh its drawbacks. I believe that this is a debatable topic.

There are several reasons why some people believe English has become a worldwide language, and it also has many benefits. The first and most important argument is that English has become an international language and that individuals in a variety of nations are studying the language to communicate with others and to facilitate their travels. Second, in the globalised world, the English language has become an integral aspect of every field, and those who speak English can obtain career prospects in their home country and abroad with relative ease.

On the other side, some argue that English's emergence as a worldwide language has had a significant negative impact on other cultures and nations. Because the growth of the English language has led to the extinction of other languages. To comprehend the universe, a vanishing language means a vanishing culture. Moreover, English is a difficult language, and its acquisition is not attainable for everyone.

In conclusion, I am convinced that the English language has many advantages for people from all areas of life. However, we cannot ignore its negatives, as the English language currently dominates society, causing a large number of individuals to adopt the western culture, which poses a threat to our own. We ought to preserve our culture, and we can learn English as a second language.

Some may say that there are inherent difficulties with socialization and practical concerns that arise when one moves to a nation where speaking a language different than one's native tongue is mandated. From a purely personal standpoint, I wholeheartedly support this speculation. When moving to a new place where you must adapt your speech, you may encounter a number of social challenges.

First, they may have trouble integrating into local society if the bulk of locals is elderly and suspicious of anyone who doesn't speak their original mother tongue. Second, it becomes more challenging to make friends, because individuals are more comfortable interacting with those who share their language and culture.

Practically, there are several contexts in which a person's inability to speak a foreign language fluently has been a significant challenge. For instance, there is a great deal of misunderstanding at work, which may eventually cause people to base their judgments on erroneous information. As a result, the employee may suffer catastrophic consequences. Similar issues arise when people engage in typical daily interactions, such as while shopping. Many foreigners confessed that they had difficulty expressing their needs clearly to merchants, and as a result of their exhausting attempts, they tend to avoid engaging in more difficult talks.

In conclusion, it is indisputable that living in a nation where you must substitute your native tongue with another language has detrimental implications. In addition to hindering your capacity to assimilate into a new culture and establish new friends, it also jeopardizes your career and makes your everyday routines more demanding. I firmly feel that this remark is correct and that we should attract greater attention to it.

Model Sample Answer 2 Band 7.5

Migrating and visiting other countries are two of the most prevalent activities nowadays. Because learning a new language is challenging, people often struggle with serious social and practical social difficulties, such as communicating with others and doing everyday tasks.

It's important to remember that culture shock is a significant source of conflict in interpersonal relationships. The language barrier is one of the causes of this issue. It can be difficult for expats to make friends in a new country since locals tend to talk about a broad variety of topics, not just the food and the weather. Some people claim that even with formal language training, they still struggle to interact fluently with native speakers. Because of this, people tend to avoid forming strong relationships with neighbors and instead keep to themselves inside the confines of their own community.

In addition, I believe that one's inability to speak the regional accent may limit their opportunities to get a job in the area. Even for low-paying professions like filling out waivers, having a high degree of language ability is required in order to secure employment in a foreign country. As a direct consequence of this, a significant number of immigrants struggle financially. The problem is not with the routine of everyday life. If you know very little or nothing at all about the local language, it may be difficult to understand the contents of packaged things, such as food cans or cartons, as well as their instructions for preparation, which may cause you to consume a diet that is less varied.

In brief, I concur with the statement that it is tough on both a social and a practical level to live in a nation where there is little access to the native language.

Most individuals wish to move overseas in this era of fast development to improve their language skills, get a better career, and experience different cultures. If people travel to a distant nation, they may have trouble learning a new language, making friends, and obtaining a job. Speaking a foreign language affects people's living conditions and social life, therefore those who move abroad face various challenges. Speaking that language while living abroad can cause two big issues, in my opinion.

To do even the most fundamental tasks and become fluent in the necessary language, ex-pats must engage in frequent conversation with locals. Whoever travels overseas may find this very challenging. Many studies show that people in communities where members are required to learn a new language quickly adapt to their new surroundings and are able to lead fulfilling lives without constant linguistic challenges.

Finding work can also be difficult if you are required to speak a language that is not your native tongue, which brings us to our second point. People who are foreigners in a country may have a more difficult time finding work there, which can lead to feelings of depression and anxiety. On the other hand, people who are accustomed to speaking a foreign language may have an easier time finding work, because employers prefer to collaborate with nations that speak more than one accent.

When these considerations are added together, it becomes clear that persons who are forced to communicate in a foreign tongue often have significant difficulties. They may be limited in their professional and social options without learning this language, but the rewards for doing so are substantial.

Any region's cultural identity cannot exist without its native tongue. If you are a foreigner who lives in another country, you need to be familiar with the language and culture of that country; otherwise, you will suffer penalties not just socially but also practically. This article takes the position that this idea is correct for the reasons that are presented below.

Foreigners who travel far from home often encounter accent-related problems. They can't understand locals, which leads to misunderstandings and wrong orders. Non-native speakers who can't communicate at work may cause complications. Because of our social nature, we can't maintain healthy mental and emotional states without the company of others. In addition, developing our social skills requires regular interaction with other people, and interpersonal skills have always been an integral aspect of effective communication. For this reason, our professional and personal lives may suffer if we are unable to express ourselves freely in this setting.

The development of a nation's economy is directly correlated to the prevalence of its vernacular language. If you do not know the local language, you will not be able to get work in the area, and without a job, you will not be able to stay alive in that location. All of the local stores and all of the local sellers only speak their original language.

In conclusion, If someone is not able to speak a new language, it will have ramifications not only emotionally but also economically. This is my perspective, and of course, there is some validity to the notion that one should know how to speak a foreign language.

As computers translate quickly and accurately, learning foreign languages is a waste of time. To what extent do you agree?

Give reasons for your answer and include any relevant examples from your knowledge or experience.

Write at least 250 words.

Model Sample Answer 1 Band 8

In recent times, due to the development of technology, individuals may now comprehend foreign languages by using a translation website. Thus, some individuals argue that learning other languages is superfluous. I partially agree with the approach, and my preference will be explained in upcoming paragraphs.

To embark with, studying a foreign language is advantageous since it is essential to comprehend diverse cultures. Furthermore, languages are integral to every society. According to the survey, there are a large number of similar terms that are used to refer to anything. Thus, language is more important than a translator in order to swiftly reply or comprehend any given statement.

Furthermore, it should be emphasised that despite the fact that machine translation allows us to connect with individuals across the globe who do not share a common language, learning a new language has several advantages that cannot be replicated by any other means. If individuals rely only on computer translation, they will become reliant on it. Therefore, to be constantly engaged, people should learn a language rather than rely on a translator. However, I would not exclude the notion that machine translators are as effective as elderly individuals who cannot learn a language. Additionally, even if they do not comprehend the foreign language, seniors may interact with everyone because of the translator. Consequently, translators are also important; yet, this problem may be resolved if they went outdoors with someone.

Model Sample Answer 2 Band 7.5

In recent times, technology is increasing day by day. Some people argue that studying a foreign language is a waste of time since machines can translate more quickly and precisely. I disagree with this approach to a major extent, and my preference will be discussed further.

To begin with, the advantages of studying a foreign language cannot be replaced by anything else. Even if computers make all tasks simpler, they cannot replace the effect of direct communication via language. Using a translator at school, for instance, makes it very difficult for pupils to even pose questions to the instructor. Therefore, in order to communicate directly and without problems, language study is essential.

Furthermore, everything is now converting towards an international language. If individuals want to work with any international company, then it would be essential for them to learn the language, because they cannot use translators every time to talk to someone; as a result, learning a foreign language makes all work easy compared to translators. Thus, language has its own benefits.

However, I would take into account the fact that translators capture the right meaning of the original text and give linguistic precision, while people may make errors when learning or translating meaning. Because error-free transmission is always advantageous, regardless of the circumstance. Thus, computer translators are essential for avoiding errors.

To conclude, although translators translate effectively, learning a language is more useful since it enables individuals to articulate their opinions with the proper tone and respect, as well as to research their respective disciplines.

Some people believe that learning a new language is a waste of time since, as technology advances, people are increasingly employing online translators rather than studying a foreign language. I partially disagree with this statement, and my preference will be addressed in upcoming paragraphs.

To embark with, translators are useful and accessible to a certain degree. Since these programmes can translate complicated statements into simple ones in a matter of seconds, an increasing number of individuals are depending on this feature to manage languages. According to the survey, the majority of persons employ interpreters when communicating with or explaining anything to overseas folks. Thus, translators are advantageous since they facilitate communication. In addition, since translators provide accurate translation, it gives the ability for two groups to communicate and exchange ideas from different nations. Moreover, tools use a mechanism that breaks down words to translate, allowing both parties to comprehend the communication format. For instance, this form of translator is used by the government during international meetings.

However, I would consider the fact that language affords several opportunities to learn about other cultures. If a person travels abroad for business or vacation, knowing foreign language is necessary in order to converse effectively with the locals. In addition, via the use of emotion and tone, they are able to form unique ties with individuals of all cultures. Hence, education is essential.

To conclude, even though learning a language is important, using computer translators is more advantageous as it helps to understand other languages more effectively, make easy to communicate.

Model Sample Answer 4 Band 6.5

Due to modern advances in technology, individuals may comprehend other languages without learning them. Some individuals believe that studying new languages is a waste of time. I disagree with this statement to a major extent, and the more details will be explained further.

To begin with, learning foreign language not only benefits communication, but also it is a great way to keep the brain sharp and active. Because people should always be careful while talking in other languages in order to make the exact explanation, and to clear the meaning. For example, with international clients, individuals should always learn a language and also be able to make their point. Thus, it is necessary to learn a different language.

Furthermore, foreign language study provides you a world of employment options. It is common knowledge that studying a foreign language may increase one's work opportunities. More organisations than ever are doing business in dozens of countries across the globe, but they cannot do so unless they employ individuals with at least one foreign language skill. Thus, for better job options, learning a language is required.

However, there is a fact that translators are vital because they enable us to work together and learn from one another. Without precise and efficient translation, the world would have fallen behind by many years, since we would be unable to exchange ideas and collaborate with other societies.

To conclude, a translator is necessary, but for effective communication and for better employment results, learning a foreign language is required.

The relationship between language and culture is like that of a chicken and an egg. When people speak, they are essentially expressing their cultural values verbally. In my opinion, it is impossible to learn a language "properly" without also becoming familiar with the social and cultural context of the people who speak that tongue. I hope to provide evidence for my claims in the following essay.

Some people are able to master a dialect without ever investigating the customs of the people who speak it. They likely have a natural aptitude for linguistics and would succeed under any conditions if they put in the time and effort. Yet for the majority of people, studying in a social setting is the key to acquiring a second language properly. There is so much more to speech than just how we talk to one another. It's several things at once: an art form, a science, a way of life, a sense of self, and a way of seeing the world. It's a standard of living. Changing your perspective is like getting new spectacles. The Eskimos, for instance, have 24 words for snow, including "aput" (ground snow) and "gana" (drifting snow). Their vocabulary is more heavily influenced by snow than ours is, and their culture as a result. Understanding the significance of these concepts necessitates familiarity with their heritage and way of life.

Language has dialects, nuances, and idioms that can only be understood by immersing oneself in the culture and way of life of its speakers. The native language of the Punjabis, for illustration, is Punjabi. There are two distinct speech patterns, or dialects, in this area. Unless you spend significant time with the people who speak these accents or study their culture, you will never be able to understand or speak either of them.

Nuances, or delicate shades of meaning, are another aspect of language that cannot be learned in isolation. In the end, it's more fun to study a new vernacular if we take the time to familiarise ourselves with the people and customs behind it. We're more interested in expanding our linguistic horizons.

In conclusion, I write to assert that knowing about the culture and lifestyle of people is unquestionably required if one is to learn a language effectively. It's a great way to have fun while getting a leg up on acquiring the language's subtleties and regional varieties. Knowing more about the country where the language is spoken will help us learn it more effectively.

Today's technologically-advanced society places a premium on those who demonstrate a hunger for intellectual growth by expanding their linguistic horizons. It has been argued that learning a language effectively necessitates familiarity with the customs and history of its speakers, while others have expressed scepticism on this score. But the earlier statement is one with which I wholeheartedly agree.

As a preliminary matter, some argue that understanding the background and customs of a speech is crucial to smoothly using it. This is because learning new words often requires familiarity with previously unknown concepts. Even a small change will introduce many false assumptions. While speaking with someone in a foreign language, for instance, one must give careful consideration to the words they choose. Misuse of a misspelling or misunderstood phrase could cause confusion among the native speakers of the language and disrupt communication within the country.

Additionally, in order to converse more precisely, one needs to have in-depth knowledge and awareness of the social traditions of a country, the way of life of the local people who reside there, and the traditional elements of the specific wording. Presenters should also take into account the cultural norms of the listeners they are addressing, and utilise appropriate slang and idioms when conversing with them. Hence, awareness of society's rules is prerequisite to mastery of the dialect. It used to be vital to learn about a culture before attempting to acquire a language, but in today's globalised and autonomous world, that's not the case. They may simply translate and interact with others of any language thanks to today's translation soft wares and applications.

In recapitulation, learning a new language and becoming fluent in it is less significant than learning about the environment, history, and way of life of individuals in that nation.

Moreover, novices should make it a point to do so right away. A language's acquisition is easier, in my opinion, when one is familiar with the country, the customs, the rituals, and the manner of life of the people who use that tongue.

Model Sample Answer 3 Band 7

Learning a language can be simple, but communicating like a native speaker and understanding that language can be difficult because it requires more than just learning words and grammatical rules. It has been scientifically proven that people frequently mean completely different things than what they say, and even the slightest change in our tone changes the meaning. I completely agree with the viewpoint that in order to truly master a language, one must first learn about the country in which the language is spoken. Without understanding the cultural, historical, and social aspects of the country, one cannot truly master a language.

To initiate speaking a foreign language, people must first learn its grammatical aspects and vocabulary, and then practise it for at least a year. On the contrary, we learn our mother tongue from our surroundings, including our parents, teachers, and relatives, as well as from life experience. We understand when to use an expression, sarcasm, shorten our vocabulary, and avoid a word. This all seems natural to us because we learned it through experience rather than books. However, in order to properly learn a foreign language, we must first learn about the people and their lifestyles. For example, I had many Spanish-speaking friends at school and took three Spanish classes. I can communicate and express myself in Spanish, but if you ask me how much I know about this language, I would say almost nothing. This is due to my lack of knowledge of the Spanish people's cultural and historical aspects.

Secondly, when people migrate to a different country, they learn to communicate in a different language. I personally know many people who can speak English fluently after migrating to and living in an English-speaking country. Some of these people were even less educated, but because they were exposed to the culture, lifestyles, and environment of an English-speaking country, they picked up the language. According to my experience, the learning process of a language can be accelerated when someone is exposed to the country and its cultural aspects where it is spoken.

In conclusion, learning a language requires knowledge of a country, its citizens, history, lifestyle, cultural, and traditional aspects. Many people worry about whether or not people who are learning a new language should also learn about the country. Some people say that understanding the culture and way of life of the local people is an important part of learning a language, but others disagree. As for me, I agree entirely with the first.

The following are some of the reasons why people tell students to learn about the native cultures. First of all, it will make students more interested in their studies. Some educators find it boring and time-consuming to just memorise words and grammar rules. Instead, they are more keen on discovering about foreign cultures, such as how people live and what kind of music they listen to. When individuals like a country's history and culture, they are willing to put in more work on the subject.

Second of all, knowing how humans live and how they talk helps with communicating with native speakers. To better understand the language, speakers should be able to use or understand the right slang and idioms in sentences when expressing their thoughts. This can only be done by gaining knowledge about the culture and the way people think. But some people claim that it's a waste of time to look into things that don't matter. A lot of them think that they will never go to other nations, so they don't need to know what makes them unique. For example, some learners require a language class just to make themselves more employable, since speaking more than one language is a plus when looking for a job. So, they only need the most basic language skills because they don't want to waste time in class on things that don't matter.

To sum up, I believe it's crucial for people to learn about their cultural background and historical traditions because it can make studying much easier.

Weddings are more expensive in many countries nowadays when compared to the past. What is the reason behind this? Is this a positive or negative development?

Give reasons for your answer and include any relevant examples from your own knowledge or experience.

You should write at least 250 words.

Model Sample Answer 1 Band 8

In this day and age, compared to yesteryear, weddings around the world have become more expensive and larger. The major reason is, it helps people to socialize more and have one-to-one conversations. I firmly bolster such an occurrence. Both the reasons and my opinion are justified below.

Scrutinizing the root causes, the first and foremost reason for such lavish weddings is that it is a one-time experience and to celebrate it wholeheartedly people having middle-class standards spend a lot for their own happiness. Anyone who has previously attended weddings will naturally strive to outdo their previous experiences in terms of size and cost. This proclivity to outperform previous achievements is combined with increased disposable income. Most importantly, there has been a drastic surge in the economies around the world, allowing people to spend money on various luxuries such as memorable wedding parties.

According to my perception, the major reason is people will interact with each other and it will help them socialize more and bring them close. Apart from this, assuming a person is planning a wedding that will not financially burden them in the future, it is a huge plus for the bride, groom, and all attendees. Moreover, in certain nations marriage is considered to be an auspicious, meaningful, and enduring moment for instance. The small and large bursts of happiness produced by such an event are worth more than a variety of other expenses that people frequently prioritize.

To sum up, excessive spending in any area can be detrimental if it greatly exceeds one's earnings. However, it is beneficial for individuals to talk and socialize. Also, it is said to be very auspicious and meaningful. Therefore, it is critical that weddings do not go above and beyond one's means.

Compared to yesteryears, in today's generation, marriage ceremonies in various countries are more lavish. The major reason behind this is the impact of various social networking sites on people's lives is the primary reason for this trend. I truly believe it is a more detrimental phenomenon than an affirmative. The reasons are discussed in the ensuing paragraphs.

The first and foremost reason is social networking sites such as Facebook, Snapchat, Twitter and Instagram are the main reason for lavish weddings. More specifically, people are so heavily influenced and inspired by these mediums that they tend to imitate each other. For example, 90% of the population cares about their fame, so much is invested in wedding planners, famous photographers, and makeup photography by their artists.

On the other hand, while an expensive wedding can be fun, couples should consider some potentially negative consequences before setting a large budget. For starters, it causes stress. In other words, selecting more expensive wedding items and services may raise your expectations and, as a result, your stress level. If the band you paid a lot of money for ends up being terrible, it will be a bigger problem than if you hired a cheaper DJ. Secondly, it has a devastating effect on a person's financial situation. To illustrate, a bank conducted a survey in 2015, which revealed that the number of loans taken for marriages had increased to 85%, resulting in a massive amount of debt, which was one of the burdensome responsibilities for salaried people.

To sum up, with the popularity of wedding-themed reality TV and in-depth coverage of celebrity weddings, many couples are feeling pressure to spend even more money on their big day, but going into debt is almost always a bad way to start a marriage.

In many countries, getting married is becoming more expensive than in the past. This is because many people do not understand why a wedding is held. I do not support such an occurrence in my opinion. So, in this essay, I will elaborate on this topic.

Nowadays, many people marry for the wrong reasons. Some people are only interested in the wedding day itself, rather than the entire marriage. It's all about status and being seen these days. Many people are competing to see who can throw the best wedding, which raises the overall cost of the event. This has a negative impact because it leaves many people in massive debt, and they begin their lives paying off debts rather than enjoying their love.

Weddings were traditionally held for close family and friends, with the goal of celebrating love above all else. However, it is now more important to wear the best designs and even invite people you don't know simply because they are of higher status. Many people will tell you that their wedding will be the talk of the town. It demonstrates that people marry for a variety of reasons, including the desire to be seen, to show off, or to demonstrate that they are capable of doing so. A lavish wedding would be that of a popular icon named Somizi and his fiancée Mohale. It was a stunning wedding. As a result, some countries would like to replicate such an expensive wedding.

To summarise, today's weddings are more expensive than ever before because society believes that if it isn't big, it's boring.

It has been repeatedly observed that the rising cost of weddings in many countries is becoming more visible these days. Nowadays, there is a swift inclination in the income and the life expectancy has also increased which is the major root cause for such lavish weddings. The reasons and my inclination is discussed below.

The first and foremost reason is, in comparison with past years individuals tend to work harder to receive higher financial rewards which will improve living conditions. In addition to this, these wedding memories are unforgettable and one can cherish it all life as it is the most significant part of every individual's life. For instance, my family spent a fortune when my sister got married few months back because we wanted to make his big day memorable as it was a once-a-life experience. For the above mentioned reasons people are willing to pay for the lavish wedding costs.

In my preference it is a positive trend, as people will learn and earn more to spend loads of money on weddings and this will indirectly sure the economy. For example, a recent study conducted in China has revealed that the growing domestic consumption in recent years has made meaningful contributions to the economical growth.

To put it in the nutshell, people are spending more money on weddings than ever before. This essay discussed how this shift occurred, including higher pay and the search for unique memories. This essay also explained why the advantages of this tendency are superior.
